You need a magnet which will heat up due to an applied current, and 2. You need materials with low thermal conductivity. If we have the following metals, will their thermal properties be low enough for us to use them as the material for the electromagnet to heat it up: the tungsten stuff; or the aluminium-coated stuff. A: A weaker thermal EM requires an ever stronger permanent magnet. Conversely, a stronger thermal EM requires weaker magnets. If you used any of the materials that are magnets, it would be to make a stronger EM.
